

Living here in Stillwaters Estates residents still need a landline phone to operate our security system and to open the security gates at each entrance, from within their homes.. There is almost always a discussion on the use of cell phones and do we really need to keep going with landlines? Have they outgrown their past value and why can't we just go with cell phones? I read an interesting article this week on why landlines still serve a valuable purpose.

According to David Wallis, author of the article in AARP's online magazine titled "Why you shouldn't drop your Landline just yet", 35 percent of US households rely only on cellular phones. This is up from 20% in 2008. Phone systems like 911 are still in need of traditional copper wire landlines to register in the right area and to show your address to the operator. Phone calls from a cell phone or a Voice-Over-Internet-Phone (VOIP) will require extra routing once you reach an operator. This extra time can be crucial in an emergency.

✖ The second reason a landline is important is that during emergencies such as flood, wind or earthquake the electricity is likely to go out and cell phones are usually overwhelmed or unavailable. A copper wire landline is self-powered and unaffected by weather (this only applies to landlines that only plug into a phone connection, not to those that must be plugged into electricity).

As the author of the article says, giving up a landline to save a few dollars may not be a wise choice at this point.
